Historical/Biographical Note:

The Coffee House Club originally began in November of 1909 as an organization for literary-minded bachelors in Nashville, who held monthly meetings to exchange viewpoints on current events and cultural topics. The club held sixteen charter members, and meetings were originally held in the private dining room of Luigart's Café on Church Street. The original members decided to call the organization "The Coffee House Club," honoring the historic 18th-century coffee houses in England, which featured spirited conversations among famous intellectuals such as Richard Steele, Samuel Johnson, Joseph Addison, and Oliver Goldsmith.

In the beginning, membership in the Coffee House Club was limited to twenty-five unmarried men; however, this rule was later changed to allow married members into the club. Members were and are still elected, and membership is now limited to thirty-five regular members and twelve honorary members. The Coffee House Club currently meets monthly from October to May at Belle Meade Country Club, where papers are presented by members. Paper topics are broad and cover a large variety of subjects, including science, politics, medicine, literature, culture, and economics.

Scope and Contents of the Collection:

This collection contains materials relating to the meetings, members, and day-to-day business of the Coffee House Club. Materials include correspondence, meeting minutes, event programs, photographs, historical information, and, largely, papers presented to the Coffee House Club by its members. Dates of the records span from the club's inception in 1909 until 2014, with bulk dates between 1950 and 2009. Because of the breadth of paper topics presented to the Coffee House Club, this collection contains important materials relating to Nashville's intellectual history.
